Geopolitics, Democracy Promotion, or Cultural Identity? Explaining Foreign Policy from different theoretical perspectives

How do we explain foreign and security policy? The analysis of states' external behavior has a long tradition which goes back to the 1950s, when scholars such as James Rosenau and Richard Snyder started theorizing US foreign and security policy under the conditions of the Cold War. But at least since the debate between Kenneth N. Waltz and Colin Elman in the 1990s about whether realism is a theory of international politics or/and about foreign policy, Foreign Policy Analysis (FPA) has become a subfield of the IR discipline. FPA is a complex field, with a diverse range of different (realist, liberal, constructivist) theoretical perspectives (and various approaches within each of the traditions such as power balancing and geopolitics, bureaucratic politics and societal group decision-making, or theories focusing on psychological or societal and cultural factors driving and shaping a state's external behavior). As Stephen Walt has stated in his famous 1998 article, we have "one world, many theories". The seminar will provide an introduction (this is why the theoretical and case study menu is rather mainstream instead of integrating discourse analysis- or poststructuralist approaches such as post-colonial theory, or the foreign policies of Asian, African or American states) to theoretically informed FPA as a method to analyze the foreign and security policies of different (liberal, authoritarian, revisionist) Western states in times of global power shifts. In the first part of the seminar, we reconstruct the history of FPA and define a theoretical roadmap. In the second part, different theoretical traditions including various approaches within each tradition are introduced. In the third part, we deal with different topics of German, US and Russian foreign and security policy in order to discuss whether states either pursue goals of maximizing security or power (which is the realist core argument), or free markets, democracy promotion and human rights protection (which is the core argument of different liberal approaches), or collective goals such as integration or identity formation (which is in line with constructivist ideas about a state's self-conception, or role theory causing the state's behavior as a result of identity, political culture, or norms), or sometimes a mixed agenda. As a major aim of the seminar, we discuss whether neoclassical realism, which offers a multi-level framework integrating systemic, domestic and cognitive factors, is a rather degenerative or progressive approach at the FPA theory market.

Exam / Credit: 7,5 ECTS (Full Degree Master); Workload: 28 hours (á 45 minutes)

Performance requirements:

- active participation in the seminar, min. 75% attendance

- reading a minimum of 900 and maximum of 1200 pages (2-3 texts for each of the 14 lessons on different topics in the seminar schedule)

- one presentation of the student's own assignment(s) and one opposition to another seminar participant's assignment in the seminar;

I use a session of the seminar in the last week to do a small workshop where the students present synopsis of their papers and me and the other students can comment on them

- individual written assignment: a thesis on a topic of the seminar; min. 24.000 key strokes (10 pages paper), max. 36.000 key strokes (15 pages paper); passed/not passed (no external evaluation); For practical and pedagogical reasons, I set a deadline for paper submission 2-3 weeks after the end of the seminar (which is 15 October). I ask the students to submit by e-mail or using the assignment function in Absalon. Deadline for evaluation of the final version of the paper is 26 January 2018.
- No oral exams, no external evaluation.

Academic Qualifications to attend:

The prerequisites to attend the course/seminar are

- an interest in international politics, IR theories, and FPA theories
- a basic knowledge of IR theories (BA level)

- an interest in contemporary international politics, e.g. German foreign policy, Russian foreign policy, U.S. foreign policy, or the foreign policies of revisionist states (North-Korea, Iran) and new emerging/rising powers (such as China, India, Russia).

Competency Description / professional qualifications

This course enhances the student's ability to

- understand what Foreign Policy Analysis (FPA) is about
- to distinguish between different theoretical approaches to analyze foreign policy, and thereby deepen knowledge about FPA
- to use theoretical approaches in order to analyze the foreign policies of particular states
- to understand the foreign policies of particular states

The course is a good starting point to deepen FPA and IR theories, and it is relevant to students who aim a career in, for example, diplomacy, the government, or public administration in the country or in the EU.

Knowledge, skills and competences

- Students will obtain concrete knowledge on IR and FPA theories and case studies
- Students will learn to distinguish between different theoretical approaches in IR/FPA
- Students will be able to use theories in order to analyze specific cases of foreign policies of different states
- Students will be able to evaluate different theories (pitfalls/shortcomings and opportunities)
- Students will get an introduction and overview on FPA, and deepen competences in IR

Teaching and Learning Methods

The seminar will consist of a combination of presentations (mini-lectures) by the teacher (introduction and conclusion in each lesson) and student presentations (to each theoretical approach and empirical case study), discussion of the texts, group discussion about theoretical perspectives and case studies, and possibly external speakers/guest lectures.

Criteria for achieving the goals (standard formulation for all courses and graded seminars)

• Grade 12 is given for an outstanding performance: the student lives up to the course's goal description in an independent and convincing manner with no or few and minor shortcomings

• Grade 7 given for a good performance: the student is confidently able to live up to the goal description, albeit with several shortcomings

• Grade 02 is given for an adequate performance: the minimum acceptable performance in which the student is only able to live up to the goal description in an insecure and incomplete manner.'
