„Constitutional Restraints due to International Conventions on Human Rights“

Prof. Yaniv Roznai,
Associate Professor at the Harry Radzyner Law School, Interdisciplinary Center Herzliya

Supra-national limitations on constituent power?

This lecture discusses whether the constitutive authority, i.e. the power to establish or change constitutional norms, is subject to "supranational" restrictions arising from a set of principles or laws placed outside the state constitutional order, such as international, supranational or regional law. The question of the existence of such restrictions is therefore particularly important as it brings the tension between state sovereignty and the international community to its peak; if the answer to this question is yes, it has an effect on the 'local' conception of constitutions, and moreover, on the idea of 'sovereignty of the people' itself. Theoretically, supranational legal restrictions are imposed on the constitutive powers, and these restrictions are even enforced by extraterrestrial actors. However, a comparative look shows that despite the apparent superiority of supranational law, in practice, domestic constitutional law still prevails over international law, and supranational restrictions actually need constitutional provisions to increase their effectiveness and enforcement in most countries. In a recent development, state courts - mainly in Latin America - apply international human rights law to determine that provisions appearing in the original constitution are invalid and should not be implemented. On the face of it, this seems to be a dramatic - and positive - development in terms of international law. A deeper examination of these judicial decisions in their political context, however, shows that it is in fact an abuse of international law by courts acting "in the service" of the executive branch to eliminate Presidential term limits and perpetuate their stay in power.
